There was a big mud hole right in the middle of the street. The deacon thought he would drive around it. The horse mistook his intention. The instan he turned out away he went, evidently with the intention of going to the front. The deacon called "whoal" and sawed at the bit with all his might, but it was no use. The horse was going by, and he never slackened his pace until he had passed the whole procession-mourners, hearse, carriages, preacher, and all. The people looked after the flying deacon in wonderment. He turned into a side street, and waited until the procession had son has already been made public as passed by, when he fell in at the rear and drove to the church. Since that, when he is in a funeral procession, he keeps right in the middle of the road regardless of mud holes.
